

MENTAL HEALTH AND ADDICTIONS

COVID-19 has compounded mental health issues amongst our family, friends and coworkers, whether facing everyday life or changes in their work.

GIVE THE GIFT OF COUNSELLING

Rob's life has never been easy. As a young teen he began to experience the symptoms of bipolar disorder and to cope with the effects, he turned to drugs. In his early 20s, Rob's mental health issues and addictions started taking over. He first lost his employment and then his apartment. Rob's life changed when a mental health outreach worker got in touch with him at a homeless shelter. The worker helped him find harm reduction strategies and counselling to work through his addiction, tactics to manage his bipolar disorder, and ultimately linked him with a men's recovery house where Rob currently lives. Without the intervention of an outreach worker, Rob's life story could have turned out very differently.

Half of Canadians say their mental health has deteriorated during COVID-19.

In June 2020, there were 175

overdose related deaths in BC

A 130% rise in such deaths over June 2019.

Mental health and addictions challenges can be hard to talk about and even harder to face when you or someone you love is affected. COVID-19 has compounded existing conditions for some and triggered new challenges for others especially considering family disruption, domestic violence, loss of income and isolation are on the rise.
